Report

Canada's Downstream Logistical Infrastructure

I: Introduction

The logistical infrastructure that is associated with the manufacture and consumption of petroleum products in Canada is poorly understood outside of the petroleum industry. With a growing interest and activity with respect to renewable fuels, there will be a need to better understand this infrastructure by stakeholders such as government, renewable fuels providers, and the downstream sector itself. The adoption of renewable fuels mandates will necessitate an infrastructure for ethanol and biodiesel that must eventually integrate into the existing conventional fuels infrastructure.

Although this study was undertaken as part of a one-time study ultimately funded by Alberta Energy, MJ Ervin & Associates Inc. (MJEI) intends to update this material on an annual basis, and eventually expand the scope and degree of detail over time.

Thank you to those organizations that contributed data to this study. Like any first-time research of this nature, it may contain some inaccuracies or omissions, and we would welcome any observations to that effect. Similarly, if you have any suggestions as to how we could improve the usefulness or readability of this report, please feel free to contact us.

DISCLAIMER

The narrative and data contained in this report was prepared on the basis of participation by numerous organizations involved in downstream logistical operations. MJ Ervin & Associates Inc. does not warrant the completeness or accuracy of the information contained herein, and accepts no responsibility for the consequences of its use.

II: Overview

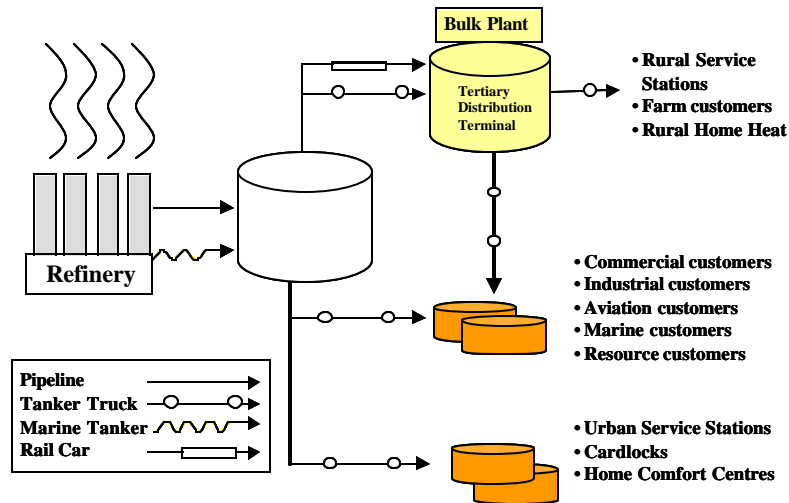

The logistical infrastructure associated with the manufacture, transport, storage and sale of petroleum products can be summarized in terms of several key elements:

- Refineries
- Pipelines
- Marine transportation (ships and barges)
- Primary storage and distribution terminals
- Rail transportation
- Bulk plant (tertiary) storage facilities
- Road transport “tanker trucks”
- “End-Use” facilities (gas stations, cardlocks, FBO’s) and customer-based storage/fuelling facilities

Figure 1 illustrates this infrastructure in terms of typical product flows, encompassing the logistical framework by which petroleum products are manufactured, transported, stored and dispensed to consumers.

This report focuses on those elements that are particularly relevant to diesel fuels: refining, terminals, pipelines, bulk plants and cardlocks.

In Canada, large-scale movements of petroleum products generally occur within four regional supply “orbits”. These orbits are defined as regions within which a great deal of product movement occurs and outside of which very little product is inter-regionally imported or exported. Figure 2 illustrates the geographic domain of these orbits, which are:

- Western Canada
- Southern Ontario
- Laurentian Region
- Atlantic Canada

Volumes have been expressed in metric form throughout this report, as most data was reported in these units of measure. For reference, a cubic metre (or 1000 litres) is equivalent to 6.29 barrels.

III: Refining Infrastructure

A petroleum refinery is generally defined as a processing facility where crude oil is converted into marketable petroleum products. By this definition, there are sixteen petroleum product refineries in Canada (as shown in figure 3 and Annex A), and a number of upgrader plants located in the Alberta/Saskatchewan region associated with Canada's oilsands (the principal source of feedstock for the upgraders).

Although heavy oil upgraders (used to convert very heavy grades of crude oil into lighter "synthetic" crude oil) are typically not considered refineries, they are included in Annex A, since some upgraders are potentially able to produce certain grades of distillates (including diesel) that require little or no further refining.

Canadian refinery production is in the order of 328,000 cubic metres (2.1 million barrels) per day. A significant proportion of this production is in the form of diesel fuel and other middle distillates such as furnace oil (table 1).

IV: Refined Product Pipelines

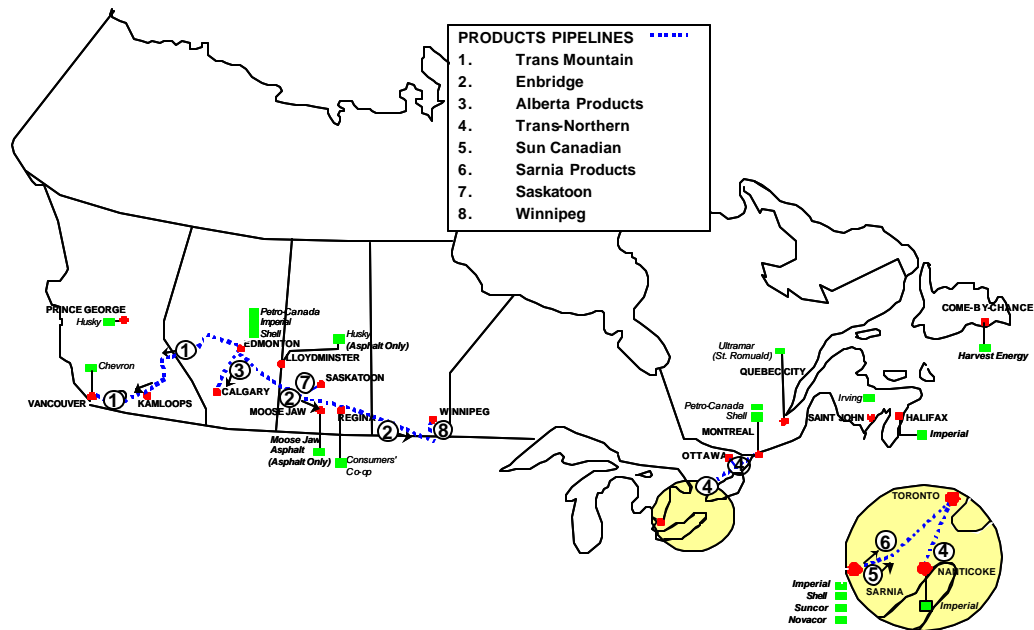

The movement of large quantities of petroleum products, whether over a short distance or over hundreds of kilometers, is most cost-effectively accomplished through pipelines, with marine transportation being the most effective means in areas not served by pipeline due to geographical challenges or lesser volumes. Pipelines and ships are therefore the two principal logistical links between refineries and distribution terminals that receive and store products.

In Canada, pipelines are that principal link, particularly in Western and Central Canada, with marine being the principal link in Atlantic Canada. Annex A provides details of Canada's pipeline infrastructure, which in summary accounts for product movements:

- From Edmonton refineries to Burnaby (TransMountain Pipeline)
- From Edmonton refineries to Western Canada (Enbridge Pipeline)
- From Montreal refineries to Toronto (TransNorthern)
- From Nanticoke to Toronto (TransNorthern)

The TransNorthern pipelines transport only refined petroleum products. Various types and grades of petroleum products are taken into a pipeline in successive "batches" and delivered into terminals connected to the pipeline at the distal end.

On generally a monthly basis, the pipeline operator will ask providing refineries for "nominations" of products they wish to deliver to the pipeline. Based on these nominations, the operator will prepare a schedule that will determine which refinery will deliver which product on a particular date/time, and which terminal will receive which product on a particular date/time.

V: Primary Distribution Terminals

Distribution terminals represent facilities that receive petroleum products (usually from a refinery via pipeline or ship), hold those products in inventory, and then load the product onto trucks, ships, or rail cars on their journey to the end-use customer. Two types of facilities perform this role:

- Primary terminals, which handle larger volumes, and are typically the first point of inventory after the refinery; and
- Bulk plants, which handle smaller volumes, and almost always receive the product by way of a primary terminal, not a refinery (see following section).

Terminal ownership and operation

Thirty years ago, petroleum marketers maintained their own networks of primary distribution terminals. Today, marketers often share terminals in order to reduce overall operating costs, and the terminal operator simply receives a “terminaling fee” from other organizations that are lifting product from that terminal. Although terminal fees are not publicly advertised, they are likely in the range of 0.1 to 0.4 cents per litre.

Petroleum refiners account for the ownership of all but a handful of “independent” Canadian terminals. These independent terminal operators (such as Norcan and Canterm) operate their facilities as a service for hire, rather than as an integral part of an existing and well-defined logistical chain.

Product receipt into terminals

Although each of the 16 refineries in Canada would have a co-located terminal (connected by a short distance of pipeline), there are approximately 100 primary terminals in Canada, most of which are geographically separated from the refineries that supply them, and therefore depend upon a pipeline (for most of the key Canadian terminals) or marine shipping (for most coastal terminals) as the logistical link between the two. A small number of terminals are also dependant on rail supply.

Terminal storage facilities

Terminal storage capacities vary greatly, generally in the range of 20,000 cubic metres (M3) to 1,000,000 M3 or more. Tanks generally consists of a number of large (30,000 M3), floating roof tanks.

Product transfer out of terminals

Petroleum products are transferred out of a terminal facility by one of three means: onto a ship or barge, onto rail cars, or onto tanker trucks.

With the exception of a small number of co-located (with a refinery) marine terminals in Eastern/Atlantic Canada, the vast majority of product leaves a terminal by way of tanker truck destined for an end-use customer (a retail gas station, cardlock, or industrial customer, for example) or a bulk plant.

Some terminals also maintain rail-car loading facilities, although shipments by rail have declined in importance in the past several decades as road infrastructure has improved.

VI: Bulk Plant Facilities

A bulk plant is a smaller storage/distribution facility (relative to a terminal), usually receiving product from a distribution terminal instead of directly from a refinery. Bulk plants are usually located in more distant markets where it would be uneconomical or impractical to deliver product to the end-use customer (or other petroleum facility such as a gas station) directly from a primary terminal.

Bulk Plant ownership and operation

Unlike terminals (which are often shared facilities), bulk plants tend not to be shared, since they generally also serve as local sales offices, not just distribution facilities. Whereas terminal operations personnel are usually salaried employees of their associated refiner/marketer, bulk plant operators are usually contracted on the basis of a throughput commission, or as buy/sell owner/operators.

Product receipt into bulk plants

The vast majority of bulk plants receive product by means of tanker truck from a primary terminal. Many bulk plants were originally located at rail sidings, but rail usage has declined significantly with improved road quality over the past several decades.

Bulk plant storage facilities

Bulk plant storage facilities generally consist of between four and eight tanks, each with a capacity of around 100,000 litres (100 M3).

Product transfer out of bulk plants

Petroleum products are almost always transferred out of a bulk plant facility by tank trucks that are much smaller in size than a typical highway transport truck.

VII: Cardlock and Other Commercial Fuel Facilities

A cardlock is a commercial version of a retail gas station. Cardlock facilities provide fuel to commercial truckers such as long-distance haulers and city delivery vehicles. Since diesel is the principal fuel used by commercial fleets, diesel is the main offering, although many cardlocks also offer gasoline. Cardlock facilities generally provide a range of non-petroleum products and services catering to their customers, much in the same manner as retail gas stations. There are over 1000 cardlock facilities in Canada, as detailed in the table below and in annex A.

In the past thirty years, cardlock facilities have grown from relative obscurity to become the principal means by which commercial trucking operations obtain their fuel. Prior to this, commercial fleets generally owned and maintained their own on-site fuel storage and dispensing, but with the advent of cardlocks, very few fleet operators have maintained a proprietary fuelling capability.

Some commercial and industrial demand for diesel and other distillates is handled outside of the cardlock infrastructure, particularly for remote and/or off-road needs. Logging and forestry industries, for example, would rely very little on cardlock for supply.

Due to the lack of availability of total cardlock supply data for Canada, it is difficult to estimate the proportion of cardlock vs. other means of diesel fuelling by volume. It is likely however, that cardlock operations account for roughly 70% of all diesel demand in Canada.

VIII: Marine Shipping, Rail and Road Transport Infrastructure

Marine

Movement of petroleum product by tanker ship or barge is the most efficient mode for most markets in Atlantic Canada, and in many BC coastal markets outside of the Lower Mainland. Over the past several decades, Canadian petroleum companies have largely divested themselves from owning and operating their own fleets of tankers, and now mostly depend on third-party shipping operators.

On the West Coast, due to the relatively small size of the destination ports, product is shipped almost entirely by barge. The two principal marine shippers in this region are:

- Seaspan operates a 4,000 M3 barge, principally in support of the logistical link between Chevron's refinery in Burnaby, and Shell's terminal facility at Bare Point (near Nanaimo).
- Island Tug and Barge operates several petroleum barges (up to 10,000 M3) for transport of product along the BC coastline.

On the East Coast and Great Lakes, a variety of shipping operators load product from refineries in Quebec and Atlantic Canada, for supply of marine terminals (and some bulk plants) within those regions, as well as for export to U.S. markets. Among the principal operators are:

- Algoma Tankers, operating five tankers with a total deadweight capacity of 71,130 tonnes or 503,611 barrels (80,000 M3).
- Rigel Shipping, operating three tankers, each with a 10,500 M3 capacity.
- Irving Oil, with three tankers for U.S. trade and one (37,000 tonne) vessel for Canadian trade.
- Coastal Shipping Ltd, a subsidiary of Woodward's, operating three tankers principally for trade in Labrador and Nunavut.

Rail

Although pipelines and marine constitute the principal mode of petroleum supply to terminals, rail is an important link for a number of terminals with no or limited access to a pipeline, or with no or only seasonal access to marine supply. Thunder Bay ON, Terrace BC, and Kamloops BC are examples of terminal locales that receive significant product supplies by rail.

CN is the principal provider of petroleum rail service in Canada, although CPR promotes an ethanol transportation capability.

Road Transport

The vast majority of petroleum products make the final part of their journey to the end-use customer or facility by means of tanker truck. Petroleum marketers and terminal operators have been trending away from in-house ownership and operation of tank truck fleets, towards the use of common carriers.

There are hundreds of common carriers involved in the transport of petroleum products across Canada, although an estimated 70 percent of terminal-originated shipments are likely serviced by the top 10-12 common carriers.

Annex A: Infrastructure Survey Results

This annex provides detailed listings of locations and features relating to the following downstream infrastructure:

- Refineries
- Pipelines
- Terminals
- Bulk Plants
- Cardlocks

Terms and Definitions

Bulk Plant: A smaller storage/distribution facility, usually receiving product from a distribution terminal (vs a refinery). Bulk plants are usually located in more distant markets where it would be uneconomical or impractical to deliver product to the end-use customer (or other petroleum facility such as a gas station) directly from a primary terminal.

Cardlock (aka Commercial Cardlock): This is the trucker's version of a retail gas station, where large commercial trucks obtain fuel. The main petroleum product sold at cardlocks is diesel fuel, but some cardlock facilities also dispense gasoline for commercial vehicles that are gasoline-powered.

M3: Cubic metres. A cubic metre is equivalent to 1000 litres, also referred to as a kilolitre (KI). One cubic meter equals 6.29 barrels.

Marine Terminal: A terminal facility that has the capability of receiving or discharging product from/to a barge or petroleum tanker ship.

Pipeline: The primary means of moving large volumes of petroleum products over long distances. Pipelines that transport refined petroleum are either Mixed (transports crude oil at some times) or Refined only. Most refined product pipelines transport various types of fuels, although some are dedicated to one product only, such as jet fuel.

Pipeline Receipt/Delivery Points: Fixed junctions along a pipeline that either receive product from a nearby refinery or discharge product into a primary terminal facility.

RBOB/PBOB: Regular (or Premium) Blendstock for Oxygenate Blending. RBOB and PBOB are formulations of gasoline specifically for the eventual blending with Ethanol (typically 10%).

Refinery: A processing facility for the purpose of converting crude oil into marketable petroleum products. Although heavy oil upgraders (used to convert very heavy grades of crude oil into lighter "synthetic" crude oil) are typically not considered refineries, they are included here since some upgraders are able to produce certain grades of distillates that require little or no further refining.

Refining Capacity: Expressed in cubic metres per day (metric) or barrels per day (U.S.). In this report, refers to the published maximum capacity of the refinery in terms of crude oil processing by means of the crude distillation unit(s) at the refinery.

SCADA Location: Systems Control and Data Acquisition Location. The location (city) where primary control of the pipeline (or any other processing facility) is exercised.

Tank Capacity/Number of Tanks: Refers to the total combined capacity and number of storage tanks at a terminal. This does not include tanks used for storing additives, slop tanks, etc.

Terminal (aka Primary Terminal, Distribution Terminal): A facility used to store inventories of refined product received from a refinery, then distributed to customers or other petroleum facilities (such as bulk plants, cardlocks, and retail gasoline outlets) via truck, barge, or rail.
